VOYAGE ACROSS
TWO OCEANS

look at the crew themselves, would at least seem to be wise of the fact. The impression is that after a great deal of trouble Captain Townsend succeeded in securing a very fair crew. Whether they are all aboard when the ship leaves Kahului none dare try to tell.

One Egyptian, a Welchman, two Irishmen, five Japanese, & Dane, a Chilean, a Mexican, two Hawaiians, seven Americans, a man from Melville, New Jersey, and one from Boston, make up the crew. Nine nationalities are represented.

Townsend certainly had a lovely time getting this crew and he deserves to hold the men until the end of the voyage is reached.

William Patrick Hickey signed on as boatswain. Hickey is well known here and has navigated a plantation as much as he has the raging main. He was feeling joyous when he went aboard the Manga Reva and laid his hand affectionately on the Captain's arm, telling him that he liked nobody better.

"Have you ever had to do with a ship any?" asked the skipper, in his quiet drawl.

"Yo ho!" roared Hickey, "had to do, is it—well now, cap, I'm just as handy at taking down a topmast as I am at answering my call to mess. I like you, captain, and I'm going with you, I'll with the wages, see."

Hickey rolled out of the cabin and yelled for the steward to make up his bunk. "Me for the oakum," he yawned.

"What d'ye size him up to be?" inquired the skipper of Long Mike, agent. "Well, he don't book for no fancy sailing," said Mike, "but he's a driver cap, aye, he's a driver and a good man aloft and pulling on a rope."

"He's kind of pert" drawled the skipper, "but that's no harm, I guess. Him and me'll get to understand each other afore long, if he stays by us. I don't go to anticipate any unpleasantness," and the gray twinkle of the captain's eye was full of humor—to a landsman.
